Yahoo! made news this week when it named longtime Google employee Marissa Mayer as its new CEO. Mayer steps in just two months after Scott Thompson resigned in May.

Mayer was not seen as a candidate for Yahoo's top spot. Earlier this summer, it was thought that Hulu CEO Jason Kilar and interim CEO Ross Levinsohn were the frontrunners. Mayer was a long-time Google employee who had been with Dish Readers: Who Are You?

We're beginning to include ads again in the Dish, after our mercifully smooth transition to the Beast. Many of you have already been surveyed by the suits (and we mean that in the nicest way) and we have some of the basic details of who you are (younger than most political sites, and much better educated, for example). But it occurred to me that the usual demo questions for ad-buyers could be spiced up a little and the sample expanded a large amount - if only for curiosity's sake. So we brain-stormed some of the questions we'd like most to know about you, and have also set up this poll for you to brainstorm and add your own questions - and answer them. Feel free to ignore questions that might help us get ads, unless you're feeling generous this Christmas season. But do throw in some questions about your fellow Dishheads that you've always wondered about or wanted to know.

The above Urtak is a quick and easy survey to get a better sense of you, the typical Dish reader. Submit Yes/No questions of your own in the field at the very top and

BLAZE READERS: HERE'S YOUR CHANCE TELL US ABOUT YOURSELVES! (NEW POLL)

There are so many of you, that we want to know more about you.

OK, OK, full disclosure: the more we know about you (things like where you live, what you like to do, etc.) the better job our sales people can do at bringing you ads for products that could benefit you. But this information will also make The Blaze a more responsive site. You see, the more information we have about your likes and dislikes, helps us tailor our stories to better match your interests.

Can you please spend a few minutes (seriously, just a couple of minutes) answering some "Yes, No, Don't Care" questions?

Feel free to suggest a question of your own!

(H/T: Andrew Sullivan of The Daily Beast - he did a similar survey on his page.)

UPDATE:

In just 24 hours we garnered two million responses. You can see the results of your responses here.
